Rhys: The next thing that I wanted to show you was, I am sure you are all familiar with book in a box, book in a bag. I was really bad when I first started teaching adapted curriculum because every book in a box or book in a bag was made for students in elementary school. So we ordered the Start To Finish, this is Start to Finish not the literacy starters, but the regular Start to Finish, so they are true books yet they are still just a little bit modified. Very good for students with learning disabilities, we share with students in our classroom that are ID-Mild, new terminology, but what we have done for UDL for these books is we have made our own book in a box. And Erica did this one, because I did not paint and shellac this coffin. Because this is King Tut’s Tomb, we actually have mummies that they can touch. We have jewels, we have dogs when we are talking about that. There is another part where there is another mummy. Yes that is the coffin and that is the tomb. There is a difference. And also for things that we do not have we have our picture vocabulary. The man was a painter so we have paint to represent him. There is something almost in every chapter that we read so we could be in a class with students with typically developing peers if they are learning this story and we could have these adaptations in our book in a box that is age appropriate. This makes me very happy. The titles range from Romeo and Juliet, Earthquakes, Anne Frank, I mean you name it. There is a group of us that are making them and trying to make all of them in the series. We will let you know how that goes when we get them all done. Again, it’s Don Johnson Start to Finish. They are divided into chapters but it’s the same thing. You are turning the pages.
