Stimulus prompts are prompts that are added to the materials. Here are some examples of a stimulus prompt. First, color coding the correct answer is a stimulus prompt because the prompts, which is the color, is embedded into the actual materials. Another example is a position cue. This is when you would place the correct answer closer to the student. Finally, a third example is making the correct answer more salient in some way. There are several ways you could prepare the materials to make the correct answer more salient. For example, placing a red dot in the corner of a target sight word, or placing pictures behind the target sight word, or bolding the correct answer.

The other type of prompting system is a response prompting system. This is a prompting system where the prompts are added after the presentation of the materials by the teacher. A verbal prompt, model prompt, and physical prompt are just a few of the prompts that can be added by the instructor.
